Aly Hassan Abdel-Gayed Mohamed

The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

This paper considers the usage of the term doctus - and doctrina in a few instances- in a literary-critical context in the Latin poets.\(^{(1)}\) The term doctus itself has the basic sense of “skilled”, “knowing” or “learned” in any endeavor at all, but acquires the sense of “educated” and “cultured”, “possessing good taste”, and even more specifically, "able to appreciate or write poetry". (OLD, s.v. doctus. ThLL 5.1, 1757. 12ff., 1757. 17ff.)

Lucilius is the first Latin poet to use doctus in a literary-critical context. He says of his reader:

nec doctissimis <nec scribo inductis nimis>. Manlium Persium<ue> haec legere nolo, Iunium Congum uolo.
Lucil. 26. 595 - 96

He writes not for “too learned” or “erudite” a reader, as represented by Manilius and Persius, but for one who is “unlearned”, as represented by Iunius Congus.\(^{(2)}\) A passage from Cicero confirms Lucilius' preference in readers:

C. Lucilius, homo doctus et perurbanus, dicere solebat ea, quae scriberet neque se ab inductissimis neque a doctissimis legi velle, quod alteri nihil intellegerent, alteri plus forasse quam ipse; de quo etiam scripsit “Persium non curo legere,“-hic fuit enim, ut noramus, omnium fere nostrorum hominum doctissimus-“Laelium

\(^{(1)}\) Sometimes the paper looks at the usage of term in prose authors such as Cicero and Quintilian, specifically when the context was literary-critical.

\(^{(2)}\) Manilius was consul in 149 B.C. and Persius was an orator of high birth who lived in the Gracchan period; Marcus Iunius Congus, who represents the reader of average learning, was the author of a legal treatise (Warmington [1957] 201, notes c, d and e).
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

Decumum volo," quem cognovimus virum bonum et non inlitteratum, sed nihil ad Persium; sic ego
...... "Persium non curio legere, Laelium Decumum uolo".
(Cic. De Or. 2. 25 [Lucil. 26. 592])

First, Lucilius himself is termed doctus, "learned", and then perurbamus, "very urbane" or "refined", which lends some context to doctus. Cicero continues on to say that Lucilius wished his readers to be neither "too unlearned", for they would not understand him, or "too learned", because they may know more than he. Note the correlation here of (non in)litteratus, "(not un)letterd", with doctus.

Lucretius uses doctus once of Greek poets. After speaking of the way the earth embodies and manifests primal forms and is the great mother and creatress of all Lucretius says: "Hanc veteres graium docti cecinere poetae" (2. 600). The ancient and docti Greek poets have sung the earth's praise. Here doctus, like σοφίς used of poets by the Greeks, can in general mean not only "skilled at poetry", but also can have the extended sense of "divinely informed" or "possessing special knowledge of subject-matter".\(^1\) Since Lucretius is speaking of matters that are beyond human knowledge - the formation of the earth and the creation of life on it - the sense of "divinely informed" as well as "poetically skilled" works very well here.

Catullus uses doctus several times. In his first and programmatic poem he uses doctus in description of the three volumes of history Cornelius Nepos wrote:

Cui dono lepidum novum libellum arido modo pumice expolitum?

(1) Cf. Solon and Theognis, who use σοφίς of the poets in the sense of "skilled in the art of poetry" (cf. Campbell [1967] on Solon 1. 52 and on Theognis 19-20); and σοφός as conceived by Pindar (Ol. 9. 28f.) and applied to poets as defined by Bowra (1964) 5:

The poet is wise because he has special knowledge, and this is not merely how to compose poetry correctly but how to reveal through it matters of first importance upon which he is uniquely informed.

Also cf. Gildersleeve (1885) XXXVI, of poetic σοφία as defined in Pindar: it is "wisdom in the art of the theme, and in the art of the treatment".; see also Nisbet and Hubbard (1990) 13.

224
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

Corneli, tibi: namque tu solebas meas esse aliquid putare nugas iam tum, cum ausus es unus Italorum omne aevum tribus explicare chartis, doctis, Iuppiter, et laboriosiss.
quare habe tibi quidquid hoc libelli, qualecumque quod <o>, patrona virgo
plus uno maneat perenne saeclo.

Catull. 1

Nepos’ chartae are both doctae et laboriosae, “learned and laboriously detailed”, attributes of a most serious work of literature in contrast to Catullus’ lepidum novum libellum.\(^1\) Doctus here appears to be an acknowledgement of the scholarly content and form of Nepos’ work as well as an epithet that marks it as within the professional literary tradition (in contrast to Catullus’ nugae).\(^2\)

Another usage of doctus occurs in Catullus’ poem 35, where he addresses his poet-friend Caecilius. At a certain point in the poem Catullus says to Caecilius’ mistress, who, enamored with Caecilius after reading his new poem, has refused to let him visit Catullus: “ignosco tibi, Sapphica puella / musa doctior” (16-17). Caecilius’ puella has more poetical taste or skill than Sappho, or Sappho’s poetry, or the Muse sappho.\(^3\) The sense of doctior in context is that Caecilius’ mistress “knows more about love poetry” than Sappho.\(^4\) In addition, doctus here has the underlying connotation of \(^1\) Ferguson (1985) 5, however, rightly notes that doctus and laboriosus apply equally well to Catullus and his associates. Cf. Τρούοφας (2001) ad loc.

\(^2\) For nugae see Copley (1951) 202-203.

\(^3\) Ellis (1979) ad loc., takes Sapphica Musa to refer to Sappho as the tenth Muse, and cites several instances from the Greek Anthology (e.g., 7. 14. 1); Fordyce, (1961) ad loc., takes Sapphica Musa to mean “Sappho’s poetry” or “Sappho as poetess”.

\(^4\) Ellis (1979) ad loc., comments: “..... ‘a poetess beyond Sappho herself,’ whether as merely trained to understand poetry, or to write poems of her own, like Sampronia (Sall. Catil. 25) and Cynthia (Prop. 2 3. 11)”. Also cf. Τρούοφας (2001) ad loc., and. Fordyce (1961) ad loc.: “Caecilius’ puella is doctior, has more poetry in her, than

225
“cultured” or “possessing good taste”, as usual when used of puellae, since the mistress had enough education or exposure in literary matters and cultural experience to enable her to appreciate Caecilius' poetry.(1)

Catullus uses doctus again in a poem addressed to Hortalus, to whom Catullus writes to apologize for sending only a translation instead of a poem. He begins the poem thus:

Etsi me assiduo defectum cura dolore
sevocat a doctis, Hortale, virginibus, nec potis est dulces Musarum expromere fetus mens animi (tantis fluctuat ipsa malis.
Catull. 65. 1-4.

Catullus’ unremitting grief - for his brother, as he indicates a few lines later - calls him away from the doctae virgines, meaning, of course, the Muses. As will be seen, Latin poets regularly apply the epithet doctus to the Muses where it has the overt sense of “poetical”. Moreover, similar to doctus used of poets, doctus used of the Muses can have the dual sense of being “technically skilled in poetry” as well as “possessing special knowledge”.(2) The doctae Musae, then, stand not only for technical poetic skill, but also are the source of divine insight and inspiration for the poets. The overt sense of this passage, then, appears to be that Catullus lacks inspiration to write poetry because of his grief at his brother’s death. Note, however, also the secondary sense of Catullus being separated, because of Sappho: from Catullus’ time onwards doctus is almost a technical term for poetic ability”.

(1) Pascal (1920) 111-12, takes doctus by extension of sense to mean mandano, “worldly”, and also cultus, “cultured”, on the basis that doctrina in elegant Roman salons was not defined by erudition, but by knowledge and appreciation of love poetry, music and other arts, and pursuits of leisure. Other similar instances of doctus used of puellae follow in this paper.

(2) Cf. in Hesiod’s invocation to the Muses (Theog. 1-115) where the Muses grant to the poet special knowledge and the ability to communicate it (31-32, 36-43 and 104-115). Such a connotation for doctus is comparable in sense to the standing epithet σοφός used of poets by the Greeks, on which see above at Lucretius.
his grief from doctae puellae, “cultured mistresses” (as in 35. 16-17 above), another source of his inspiration (e.g., Lesbia).\(^1\)

Vergil, like Catullus, also uses doctus with the sense of “cultured” just mentioned. In the Culex\(^2\) he says in praise of the rustic life:

\[
\begin{align*}
o \ \text{bona pastoris (si quis non pauperis usum} \\
\text{mente prius docta fastidiat et probet illis} \\
\text{somnia luxuriae spretis) incognita curis} \\
\text{quae lacerant auidas inimico pectore mentes.} \\
\text{Verg. Culex. 58-61.}
\end{align*}
\]

The docta mens, “educated” or better, “cultured mind”, cannot appreciate the blessings of the rustic life caught up, as it is, in love of gain. Vergil’s use of the term doctrina in the opening of this same poem should be mentioned. He says by way of introducing his light-spirited epyllion:

\[
\begin{align*}
\text{Lusimus, Octavi, gracili modulante Thalia} \\
\text{atque ut araneoli tenuem formauimus orsum;} \\
\text{lusimus: haec propter culcis sint carmina docta,} \\
\text{omnis et historiae per ludum consonet ordo} \\
\text{notitiaeque ducum uoces, licet inuidus adsit.} \\
\text{quisquis erit culpare iocos musamque paratus,} \\
\text{pondere uel culcis leuior famaque feretur.} \\
\text{posteriori grauiore sono tibi musa loquetur} \\
\text{nostra, dabunt cum seuros mihi tempora fructus,} \\
\text{ut tibi digna tuo poliantur carmina sensu.} \\
\text{Culex. 1 - 10}
\end{align*}
\]

In this recusatio the light tone of the Culex is being contrasted to the doctrina of epic. Doctrina here consists of gravis sonus (line 8), polish (poliantur carmina, line 10), and about twenty lines later in the poem, use of mythological themes (lines 26-24). Thus is doctrina delineated.

---

\(^1\) See Quinn (1970) ad loc., and Ferguson (1985) 209, for this secondary sense.

\(^2\) E.g., Vergil’s authorship of the Culex, much disputed, is reasonably attributed to him by Barrett (1970) 361-62. Barret’s summation argument is that ancient testimonia, including Martial 8.56. 19-20 and 14.185, attests Vergil’s authorship of the Culex and modern scholarship has not produced concrete evidence to the contrary.
Several usages of doctus that occur in the Catalepton and Ciris may also be considered at this point. First, in Catalepton 5. 9 doctus has its basic sense of "learned". There the poet says:

nos ad beatos uela mittimus portus
magni petentes docta dicta Sironis, uitamque ab omni uindicabimus cura.
Catal. 5. 8-10.

The poet is seeking the docta dicta, the "learned words" of the Epicurean philosopher, Siro. Then at Catalepton 4. 8, a poem addressed to the poet Octavius Musa, the poet in expressing his affection for that man says:

(claration qui te dulcius esse potest?), cui iuueni ante alios diu diuumque sorores cuncta, neque indigno, Musa, dedere bona, cuncta quibus gaudet Phoebi chorus ipseque Phoebus;
doctor o quis te, Musa, fuisse potest?
o quis te in terris loquitur iuicundior uno?
(Clio nam certe candida non loquitur.)
Catal. 4. 4-10.

Doctor here means simply "more skilled" at writing poetry. In Catalepton 9 doctus is used of the Muses, as in Catullus. The poem begins:

Pauca mihi, niueo sed non incognita Phoebos, pauca mihi, doctae, dicite, Pegasides.

The poets asks the doctae Pegasides, "skilled, knowledgeable and inspiring Muses" for help in composing the poem. Also in 9 the poet uses doctus of Theocritus. He says of certain poems he has translated from Greek to Latin for his patron:

molliter hic uiridi patulae sub tegmine quercus Moeris pastores et Meliboeus erant, dulcia iactantes alterno carmina uersu
qualia Trinacriae doctus amat iuuenis.
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

Theocritus is termed \textit{doctus} here in his capacity as pastoral poet, presumably for the high polish of the \textit{Idylls} and his general knowledge of Greek poetry and myth, and the skill of his rendering. \textit{Doctus}, as discussed above, could also have the sense of “divinely informed” as well as "skilled." The invocation to the Muses in the opening lines of this poem lends support to that extended sense for \textit{doctus} here.

One more usage of \textit{doctus} occurs in the \textit{Vergiliana} corpus. It comes in the \textit{Ciris} where the author terms the patron of the poem, Mesalla by name, a \textit{doctissimus iuvenis} (line 36). The meaning of “learned” or “cultured” applies here although the poet’s invocation of the Muses (line 10) and preoccupation with wisdom (\textit{sapientia} personified, line 14) also mention of \textit{sophia}, lines 4 and 40) add the connotation of “very wise” for \textit{doctissimus}.

Horace uses \textit{doctus} a number of times in a literary-critical context, always with the connotation of “educated” or “trained”, more so than “divinely informed” or “inspired”. His usage of the term \textit{doctrina}, though not in literary-critical context, is revealing of this general sense he gives to \textit{doctus}. At Epistle 1. 18. 100 he asks whither “virtutem doctrina paret naturane donet?” does “training” or “instruction” bring about \textit{virtus}, or is one born with \textit{virtus}?\(^{(1)}\) Hence Horace uses \textit{doctus} several times of men who have been instructed in a discipline and are learned in the sense of “educated” or “trained”. For example, Horace uses \textit{doctus} with this general sense of Trebatius (Sat. 2. 1. 78), a distinguished legal advisor with whom Horace discusses the legal dangers of writing satire. Also Horace uses \textit{doctus} of Plato (Sat. 2. 4. 3) in his capacity of philosopher, and in the same poem of a culinary expert named Catius (Sat. 2. 4. 88), whose knowledge and zeal for cookery Horace gently satirizes by indirectly comparing him to \textit{doctus} Plato. Likewise Horace terms the \textit{rhetor} Heliodorus \textit{doctissimus} (Sat. 1. 5. 3), with whom Horace spent a night at an inn in Aricia, and uses \textit{indoctus} of a mixed audience with indiscriminate taste in music at the theater (Ars P. 212). Finally Horace uses \textit{doctus} of the fickle Priscus (Sat. 2. 7. 13) who, among his many desires, wishes to live as a \textit{doctus} at Athens.\(^{(2)}\)

\(^{(1)}\) Cf. also Carm. 4. 4. 33 where Horace uses \textit{doctrina} in the same sense: “doctrina sed vim promovat insitam”, .....

\(^{(2)}\) The alternate reading of \textit{doctor} for \textit{doctus} here does not change the sense of the usage.

229
In the next several usages of doctus that are considered Horace uses doctus in its general sense of “learned” or “trained” as above, but of would-be critics and poets. Thus he adds the connotation of “trained at, or knowledgeable specifically in poetry”. First, in the Ars Poetica he says of the mad poet:

```
certe furit ac velut ursus, obiectos caveae valuit si frangere clatros,
indoctum doctumque fugat recitator acerbus.
Hor. Ars P. 472-74.
```

The Poet’s potential audience is indoctum doctumque, “both uneducated and educated”. Similarly, again in regard to a poet’s audience, Horace at Epistle 2. 1 says:

```
saepe ctiam audacem fugat hoc terretque poetam, quod numero plures, virtute et honore minores,
indocti stolidique et depugnare parati,
si discordet eques, media inter carmina poscunt
aut ursum aut pugiles; his nam plebecula gaudet.
Hor. Epist. 2. 1. 182-86.
```

Those who are indocti stolidique, “uneducated and stupid”, interrupt a poetry reading for a bear fight or boxing. Indoctus, in accord with the previous example, has the connotation of “not learned” in a general sense, and more specifically with respect to literature poetry. Finally, with phrasing and sense similar to the two previous examples, Horace in Epistle 2 remarks on the current zeal for writing at Rome:

```
navem agere ignarus navis timet, habrotonum aegro non audet nisi qui didicit dare; quod medicorum est promittunt medici, tractant fabrilia fabri:
scribimus indocti doctique poemata passim.
Hor. Ep. 2. 1. 114-17.
```
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

Horace exaggerates for effect, but the sense of line 117 is "we all, whether schooled in the art or not, write poetry".\(^1\) Here doctus specifically pertains to poetic skills.

In the remaining Horatian usages of doctus the connotation of "knowledgeable or skilled specifically with respect to poetry" is always almost certainly present. For instance, in Epistle 1. 19 Horace says in address to his patron Maecenas:

\begin{quote}
Prisco si credis, Maecenas docte, Cratino, nulla placere diu nec vivere carmina possunt,
quae scribuntur aquae potoribus.
\end{quote}

Maecenas is doctus in his familiarity with poetry, specifically with Cratinus, the Greek writer of old Comedy. And again of Maecenas, Horace at Ode 3. 8. 5 addresses him as "docte sermones utriusque linguae", knowledgeable in the literature of both Greek and Latin.

Similarly, in Satire 1. 9 Horace uses doctus of the members of Maecenas' circle, very likely in respect to their literary skills, critical or practicing. He says there to the Bore who has asked to be introduced into Maecenas' circle:

\begin{quote}
domus hac nec purior ulla est
nec magis his aliena malis; nil mi officit, inquam, ditior hic aut est quia doctior; est locus uni
cuique suus'.
Hor. Sat. 1. 9. 49-52.
\end{quote}

Degree of wealth or literary skill do not cause envy within the group. Also earlier in this same Satire the Bore had introduced himself to Horace by saying, "Noris nos .... docti sumus" (Sat. 1. 9. 7), hoping, thus, to ingratiate himself with Horace.\(^2\)

---

\(^1\) Brink (1982) ad loc. For the sense translation. Morris (1939) ad loc., comments on line 117: "it is the amusement of the trained professional at the zealous eagerness of the amateur".

\(^2\) Several editors maintain that the use of doctus of the Bore is an attack by Horace upon the Alexandrian school (e.g., Palmer [1949] ad loc. And Morris [1939] ad loc.).
Horace also uses doctus not only for members of Maecenas' circle, but of the patrons Pollio and Messalla as well, referring to patron and writer alike. In Satire 1. 10 he says that he seeks for his poetry the approval of men like Maecenas, Vergil and quite a few others, including Pollio and Messalla. He ends by saying: "compluris alios, doctos ego quos et amicos / prudens praetereo" (Sat. 1. 10. 87-88). Here doctus indicates, just as in the previous example, one who has literary training or ability, one who is a part of the literary coterie of the day.

Similarly Horace uses doctus of a literary critic in Satire 1. 10. He says to Fundanius (unknown outside the Satires) in justification of his own criticism of Lucilius:

\[
\text{age quaeso,}
\]
\[
\text{tu nihil in magno doctus reprehendis Homero?}
\]
\[
\text{Hor. Sat. 1. 10. 51-52.}
\]

The learned critic can find something to blame even in the great Homer.\(^{(1)}\)

Finally, Horace uses doctor of Apollo in his function as patron of poets. In Ode 4. 6 Horace in asking for Apollo’s support says:

\[
\text{doctor argutae fidicen Thaliea,}
\]
\[
\text{Phoebe, qui Xantho lavis amne crinis,}
\]
\[
\text{Dauniae defende decus Camenae,}
\]
\[
\text{levis Agyieu.}
\]
\[
\text{Hor. Carm. 4. 6. 25-28.}
\]

Here doctor with fidicen has the sense of "lyric teacher" of the Muse, Thalia.\(^{(2)}\)

However, because Horace uses doctus of his own circle in the same poem and elsewhere (see immediately below), the sense probably is simply "cultured" or, more specifically, "experienced in letters".

\((1)\) Morris (1939) ad loc., comments: "The Alexandrians and their followers (the docti) criticized Homer freely".

\((2)\) Bennett (1934) ad loc. translates line 25 as "the lyric teacher of melodious Thalia", where fidicen has adjectival force and Thalia is an objective genitive. Less desirably, Naylor (1978) ad loc. takes the line as, "master harpist of melodious Thalia", where
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

In the final two examples Horace uses doctus strictly in reference to poetical skill. In Ode 1. 1 Horace, after enumerating some of the chief ambitions and pursuits of his fellow Romans, says in regard to his own aspirations:

me doctarum hederae praemia frontium
dis miscent superis, me gelidum nemus Nympharumque leves cum Satyris chori secernunt populo, si neque tibias
Euterpe cohibet nec Polyhymnia
Lesboum refugit tendere barbiton.
quodsi me lyricis vatibus inseres,
sublimi feriam sidera vertice.

Hor. Carm. 1. 1. 29-36.

As the context indicates, doctarum frontium is the equivalent of “poets’ brows”. The word that originally meant “learned” or “cultured” has come to connote specifically ”poet”.(1)

Finally, in Epistle 2. 1 Horace in his protest against archaism lists this issue among the examples of what occupies the Roman reader:

ambigitur quotiens, uter utro sit prior, aufert
Pacuvius docti famam senis, Accius alti.

Hor. Ep. 2. 1. 55-56.

The issue concerns the style of the two early Roman tragedians, Accius and Pacuvius. Brink’s conjecture that doctus here used of Pacuvius parallels the meaning of σοφίς as applied to Greek poets, particularly in its Pindaric sense of “divinely informed”, seems to go against Horace’s intent in the passage to belittle those who admire the ancient overmuch.(2) It also goes doctor has adjectival force and Thaliae is a subjective genitive standing for poetry in general. Either way the sense of doctor as “teacher” stands.

---

(1) Cf. Quinn (1980), ad loc. on line 29 gives: “‘ the ivy garlands which grace literate brows’, i.e., recognition as a poet”.

(2) Brink (1982) ad loc., equates doctus with σοφίς as specifically applied to Sophocles, with whom, he says, Pacuvius was comparatively assessed by the Romans (Brink cites against the consistent connotation which Horace has given doctus elsewhere as "learned" or "skilled". Furthermore, the antithesis of altus, "sublime", used of Accius might further suggest the sense of "schooled" or "poetically trained" for doctus here as opposed to a divinely inspired but personally unknowing or untrained poet.

233

In sum, then, for Horace, doctus, as this usage of Pacuvius and his other usages indicate, has the more specialized sense of "trained in literature" or even "technically skilled" more than the sense of "divinely informed or inspired" as in Catullus and the elegists (as will be seen). In general, doctus connotes for Horace a member of the literary coteries of the day, and ultimately, a practicing poet from that group.

Tibullus, in contrast, uses doctus several times in a literary-critical context with connotation similar to Catullus'. For example, in 2. 3 Tibullus, in speaking of Apollo’s period of servitude to Admetus, says:

O quotiens ausae, caneret dum valle sub alta,
Rumpere mugitu carmina docta boves!
Tib. 2. 3. 19-20.

Apollo, the ultimate poet, sings docta carmina, apparently meaning poems that are "well-crafted" or "artistic" as well as "divinely informed". Then in 1. 4 Tibullus uses doctus of poets. There he says in his plea to boy lovers:

Pieridas, pueri, doctos et amate poetas,
Aurea nec superent munera Pieridas.
Tib. 1. 4. 61-62.

Let the beloved prefer the Muses and "skilled" or even "divinely informed" poets over gifts of gold.

Lygdamus uses doctus twice in a literary-critical context with a sense similar to Tibullus'. First, in 3. 4 Lygdamus uses doctus, as seen several times before, of the Muses. There a youthful apparition says to the poet:

Porphyrius's note on Horace's line - "nam Pacuvius famam docti[s] aufert atque consequitur Sophoclis, Acci<us> Aeschylis Euripidis, qui dicend<e> snt <alti>" - for the parallel assessment of Pacuvius and Sophocles by Roman critics).
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

Salve, cura deum: casto nam rite poetae
Phoebusque et Bacchus Pieridesque faverant:
Sed proles Semelae Bacchus doctaeque sorores
Dicere non norunt quid ferat hora sequens.
Lygdamus 3. 4. 43-46.

The doctae Pierides, "skilled" and "knowledgeable Muses" are patrons to the castus poeta, "pure poet", but are not prophetic.

Then in 3. 6 Lygdamus uses doctus of Catullus:
Sic cecinit pro te doctus, Minoi, Catullus
Ingrate referens impia facta viri.
Lygdamus 3. 6. 4-42.

Catullus is termed doctus in context for his long epyllion (64) which contains the story of the desertion of Ariadne. The consensus is that Catullus is termed doctus by his successors in recognition of his acceptance and representation of the literary ideals of Alexandrianism, particularly with regard to the technique and form of his poetry.\(^{(1)}\) However, several scholars also see the sense of "poet inspired" or "true poet" in doctus used of Catullus (as with \(\sigma\phi\iota\) used of poets, on which see above).\(^{(2)}\) Catullus could be termed doctus with either or, more likely, both these senses here.

Similarly in 4. 6 of the Tibullianum corpus the author uses doctus of the poetess Sulpicia. There the poet says in regard to her birthday:

Natales Iuno, sanctos cape turis acervos, quos tibi dat tenera docta puella manu.
Corpus Tib. 4. 6. 1-2.

---

(1) See, e.g., Friederich (1908) 317; Fordyce (1970) 216.

(2) See Allen (1915) 223 for the concept of the Augustan doctus poeta as a divine teacher of the people and a vatis, and the same equation of doctus with \(\sigma\phi\iota\) used of poets, as discussed above (at Lucretius).
Sulpicia is called docta certainly for her marked poetic skills (six poems of the Corpus are hers). The sense of doctus here is probably the same as that of Catullus in the previous passage, namely, “skilled” and “inspired”.\(^{(1)}\)

Propertius uses doctus with a varied connotation, but again in the manner of those poets already considered. He uses it in the sense of “learned” or “cultured” several times: at 1. 6. 13 he speaks of visiting doctae Athenae, and likewise at 3. 21. 1 he speaks of a journey to doctae Athenae; also at 3. 21. 26 he terms the philosopher Epicurus doctus.

In its more specialized sense Propertius uses doctus specifically in reference to literary skills several times. For example, in 3. 21 he says in regard to a trip he meditates taking to Athens:

```
persequar aut studium linguæ, Demosthenis arma, libaboque tuos, docte Menandre, sales.
Prop. 3. 21. 27-28
```

He will study the Sales, “witticisms” of the books of doctus Menander.\(^{(2)}\) Menander is termed doctus certainly not for his erudition but for his versification and wit - that is, he was not so much learned as a skilled poet in his own genre.

Propertius also uses doctus in the context of his own love elegy. For example, in 2. 30. 16 he uses “tibia docta” for the instrument which sounds his love poetry. Likewise at 3. 23. 1 he uses doctae of the tabulae upon which he wrote his elegies. In the first example doctus has the sense of “skilled”, and in the second the sense “full of poetic accomplishment”. Then in 2. 34 Propertius says in justification of his own love poetry that both

---

(1) Smith (1913) ad loc., notes that “doctus is an evident attempt to translate the Greek σοφίς as an epithet of poets ... The poet is "wise," but his wisdom is the result of acquired skill as well as native ability ..... so the doctus is the native genius thoroughly trained in the resources of his department; in short he is the literary artist in the highest sense of that word”.

(2) For sal see my paper entitled “The Concept of sal in Latin Poetry and in Martial’s Epigrams”, which is published in this same Bulletin and also see Seager (1974) 891-94.
Varro and Catullus wrote such poems for those they loved. He continues by adding Calvus to the list:

haec etiam docti confessast pagina calvi,
cum caneret miserae funera Quintilliae.
Prop. 2. 34. 89-90

Doctus Calvus also wrote of passionate love (antecedent of haec, line 89) when he sang of the death of Quintilia (his wife). Propertius terms Calvus doctus here in his capacity as an elegist, no doubt for his accomplished style of writing (as with Catullus, with whom he is often linked), and perhaps also as a “divinely informed or inspired” poet as he canit, “sings” his grief for his deceased wife.

Finally, again in 2. 34, Propertius uses doctus of carmen in speaking of Vergil’s Eclogues, also alluding to his own poetry. He says there of Vergil in a general defense of love poetry:

non tamen haec ulli venient ingrata legenti, sive in amore rudis sive peritus erit.
nec minor hic animis, ut sit minor ore, canorus
anseris indocto carmine cessit olor.
Prop. 2. 34. 81-84

Haec (line 81) is a reference specifically to the erotic themes within Vergil’s Eclogues, and, within Propertius’ defense of elegy, to erotic poetry in general. The sense of the rest of the passage is partially conjecture as the text of line 83 is uncertain. The last two lines seem to say that erotic poetry of the Eclogues, signified by canorus olor, though lesser in os, “diction” or “expression”, than poetry of higher genres is not less in animi, “spirit” or “inspiration”. Line 84 further qualifies that elegy, despite its less elevated style, has not sunk to the level of indoctum Carmen, the “crude” or “uninspired song”, of the goose.(1) Doctum carmen connotes here then a

---

(1) Cf. Butler and Barber (1969) ad loc., who for line 83 use Housman’s emendation for MSS. (NFL) his animis (animis FL) aut sim minor ore canorus, and give this translation for lines 83-84: “And the melodious swan, displaying equal genius in these themes, though less stately diction, has not retired with the tuneless strain of a goose”. Camps (1967) ad loc., goes a step further: “The sense is that the self-critical artist proves his poem that, though it does not have elevated expression, does have animi, “spirit” or “inspiration”, and is canorus, “melodious”, - that is, “polished”, “technically perfect” - as is the swan’s song.
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

Ovid uses doctus a number of times, several times with its common connotation of “learned” or “cultured” in general, but much more often with the sense of “skilled in poetry” and even with the extended sense of “divinely inspired” several times. Ovid uses doctus with the general connotation of “learned” three times, once of Socrates (Ib. 559), once of the city Athens (Her. 2. 83), and once for men with a store of wisdom (Pont. 4. 11. 12).

Next, Ovid uses doctus many times with its general sense of “learned”, but with the context pertaining to literature. He uses doctus of Germanicus, the patron of the Fasti (1. 19), doctus of Suilius, an addressee of one of his letters from Tomi in his capacity as a scholar (Pont. 4. 8. 77), and doctus of the consul, Sextus Pompeius, to whom he addresses one of his poems from Tomi (Pont. 4. 5. 1). Finally, at Tristia 3. 1. 71 he uses docti of libelli contained in the library in the temple of Libertas, from which his books were banned by Augustus.

Ovid then several times uses doctus of those who are appreciative of or critics of poetry. For example, at Tristia 2. 1. 419 he uses docti of men who have personal libraries, and at Tristia 3. 1. 63 he uses doctum of the pectus of men who determine what materials go into public libraries. Then twice in the Ars Amatoria (2. 281, 282) Ovid uses doctae of puellae (as at Catull. 35, above) who are able to appreciate poetry written for them, and finally, he uses doctus three times of his own readers and critics (Trist. 2. 1. 119, 5. 9. 9 and Pont. 3. 9. 45). In all these uses doctus could have the sense of “cultured” as well as “learned” with respect to literature.

In this next and final grouping Ovid uses doctus in direct relation to the writing of poetry. First, he several times uses doctus of those who write poetry. For instance, at Ars Amatoria 3. 320 he uses doctus of the femina superiority to the pretentious ranter”. Note the allusion to Vergil’s Eclogue 9. 35-36 where Vergil, imitating Theocritus (7. 39), depreciates his own poetic ability in comparison with Varius’ and Cinna’s, terning himself an anser among swans. (as noted by Butler and Barber [1969] ad loc., and Coleman [1977] at Verg. Ecl. 9. 36).

The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

who is able to write lyric poetry, at Ex Ponto 2. 5. 15 of Salanus who is both critic and poet, of Brutus (the conspirator) as poetry writer at Ex Ponto 1. 1. 24, at Tristia 3. 14. 1 of men who write poetry, including himself, who have patrons, and then of poets in general (Trist. 1. 5. 57). In all these instances doctus has at least the connotation of “skilled at poetry”.

In several other cases Ovid uses doctus of poets or their poetry with the further sense of "divinely informed or inspired" as well as "poetically skilled". For example, he uses docta of his step-daughter Perilla (Trist. 3. 7. 31) in her devotion to libri and the Pierides (line 4), and to “singing" her docta carmina (line 12), in which she is second only to the “vates Lesbia” (line 20). Doctus certainly appears to mean more than simply “skilled at poetry” here. Likewise in Amores 3, his elegy for Tibullus, Ovid uses doctus of Catullus. Several times in the poem Ovid calls to mind the sacred nature of poets (e.g., “at sacri vates et divum cura vocamus", (line 17) and then ends with an image of Tibullus meeting Catullus in Elysium: "obvious huic venias hedera iuvenalia cinctus / tempora cum Calvo, docte Catulle, tuo” (3. 9. 61 – 62). Catullus, linked with Calvus (and Gallus, two lines following), is here termed doctus apparently for his mastery of learned lyric verse. The context further extends the sense of doctus to “inspired” in the sense of “possessing special knowledge” of his subject-matter. Finally, Ovid uses doctus with the extended sense of “divinely informed” as well as “skilled in poetry” in the Ars Amatoria. He says there in speaking of poets in general:

Vatibus Aoniis faciles estote, puellae:
Numen inest illis, Pieridesque favent.
Est deus in nobis, et sunt commercia caeli:
Sedibus aetheriis spiritus ille venit.
A doctis pretium scelus est sperare poetis;
Ovid. Ars Am. 3. 547-51.

The context here lends doctus used of poets the connotation of “divinely informed” as well as “skilled”.

In support of the extended sense of “divinely informed” for doctus used of poets Ovid uses of doctus of the goddess Minerva and the Muses in his Fasti. First, in one passage Ovid reveals the goddess Minerva to be the source of his information on his subject-matter:
et iam Quinquatrus iubeor narrare minores.
nunc ades o coeptis, flava Minerva, meis.
‘cur vagus incedit tota tibicen in Urbe?
quid sibi personae, quid stola longa volunt?’
sic ego. sic posita Tritonia cuspide dixit
(possim utinam doctae verba referre deae)
Ovid. Fast. 6. 651 - 56

The docta dea, “knowledgeable goddess”, gave Ovid the information on the origins of the ceremony for the lesser Quinquatrus. Similarly, twice more in the Fasti the doctae Muses are said to supply Ovid with information for his poem: at 4. 191 he asks the doctae granddaughters of Cybele (Jupiter was the son of Cybele) to provide him with information, and likewise at 6. 118 the Muse Clio and her doctae sorores give Ovid information on his subject-matter. All these usages show how doctus used of poets could connote “divinely informed or inspired”: divinities, most often the Muses, who are doctae, “knowledgeable”, themselves, impart the knowledge of subject-matter to the poet. Ovid four more times uses doctus of the Muses (doctae sorores, Met. 5. 255 and Trist. 2. 13; doctae Pierides, Trist. 3. 2. 4; doctae Musae, Ars Am. 3. 411), but with the context giving little more than the overt sense of “poetical” or “skilled in poetry”.

Phaedrus uses doctus three times in a literary-critical context. First, in the prologue to book 3 Phaedrus is encouraging his patron, Eutychus, to read the book of poetry Phaedrus has dedicated to him. He instructs Eutychus that proper appreciation of poetry takes time and effort, and to that effect notes that he himself, who was born on the Pierian Mountain, who was all but born in a schola and who has blotted out all interest in property, is only with distaste admitted into the society of poets. He continues:

Quid credis illi accidere, qui magnas opes
Exaggerare quaerit omni vigilia,
Docto labori dulce praeponens lucrum?
Phaedrus 3 prol. 24-26.
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

Doctus labor refers to the poet's training or even his profession, just described as based upon natural talent or predilection, dedication to the craft, and schooling.

Similarly, in the epilogue to book 2 Phaedrus uses doctus again of labor, and by context gives doctus even more definition. Phaedrus says there in an effort to gain recognition from his fellow Romans:

Si nostrum studium ad aures pervenit tuas
Et arte fictas animus sentit fabulas,
Omnem querelam submovet felicitas.
Sin autem doctus illis occurrit labor,
Sinistra quos in lucem natura extulit
Nec quicquam possunt nisi meliores carpere,
Fatale exitium corde durato feram,
Donec fortunam criminis pudeat sui.

Doctus labor here is synonymous with "poetry" and is given some definition by what follows: if it reaches the ears of the cultivated (aures cultas) and is found to have been written with skill (ars), then Phaedrus will achieve recognition. Doctus labor implies, then, by context poetry that itself is, through the poet's efforts, cultivated and skillfully written.

Finally, at 4. 23, entitled De Simonide, Phaedrus uses doctus of the Greek poet Simonides. He begins the poem with this line: "Homo doctus in se simper divitias habet" (4. 23. 1). The rest of the poem is an illustration of this maxim. Simonides, who supported himself by singing the praises of victors in the games, was once shipwrecked with many others. The others lost their possessions, but Simonides' poetic skill enabled him to soon reestablish his standard of living while the others were forced to beg. Here doctus connotes a man who is skilled in writing poetry. In sum, Phaedrus, like Horace, gives doctus the sense of "poetically skilled" with little or no connotation of "divinely informed".

Indoctus is used once in the Priapea in such a way that it adds to its literary-critical connotation. Poem 68 begins:

Rusticus indocte si quid dixisse videbor,
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

da veniam: libros non lego, poma lego.
Priapea 68. 1-2.

The author seeks pardon if he has spoken indocet, "unlearnedly", for he does not read books, the rest of the poem is a play upon certain scenes of the Iliad and Odyssey of which the author says he has heard. The context shows that indoctus means "poorly-read", particularly in the Greek Classics.

Persius' one use of doctus, though it does not come within a literary-critical context, is worth mention. Persius in his first satire says in criticism of legal rhetoric:

nilne pudet capiti non posse pericula cano pellere quin tepidum hoc optes audire 'decenter'?
'fur es' ait Pedio. Pedius quid? crimina rasis librat in antithetis, doctas posuisse figuras laudatur: 'bellum hoc'.

Pedius, charged with theft, sidesteps the moral issue, weighs the charges with smooth antitheses, and is praised for his docta figurae, "learned" or "artistic tropes."(1) Persius here makes doctus connote artistry or skill of an accomplished level that is misused.

Martial uses doctus in a literary-critical context often, much in the manner of the other Roman poets, though in a few cases with a connotation unique to him. Martial uses doctus in its most general sense of "learned" or "cultured" in epigram 2. 90, addressed to Quintilian, where Martial is describing what he himself desires of life. After expressing his zeal for enjoying life and his disinterest in wealth and political renown Martial says:

Me focus et nigros non indignantia fumos
Tecta iuvant et fons vivos et herba rudis.
Sit mihi verna satur, sit non doctissima coniunx,
Sit nox cum somno, sit sine lite dies.
Mart. 2. 90. 7 - 10

(1) See Bramble (1974) 123 – 126, for the interpretation of this passage.

242
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

He desires a simple, almost rustic life with a wife not too dicta, “learned”, or better, “cultured”, because a very cultured woman, a “blue-stocking”, would not be content with the rustic life Martial presents here.\(^1\)

Next, Martial uses doctus several times of men who are learned in the sense of educated, but not professional literary critics or poets, though they all are benefactors of Martial and are certainly expected to appreciate poetry and their mention in the epigram. Examples of doctus used in this context are: of Votienus of Narbo (8. 72. 5), most likely the orator who lived during the reign of Tiberius;\(^2\) of Novius Vindex (9. 43. 14), art connoisseur, whose ownership of a statuette of Hercules forms the subject of an epigram;\(^3\) of a Marcus (10. 73. 10), thought to be Marcus Antonius Primus of epigrams 9. 99 and 10. 23, one of Vespasian's generals to whom Martial expresses gratitude for the gift of a toga.\(^4\) And finally in this context, doctus is used of Licinus Sura, a man of senatorial rank who served with great distinction under Nerva and Trajan.\(^5\) Epigrams 7. 47 is addressed to Sura and begins as follows:

Doctorum Licini celeberrime Sura virorum,
Cuius prisca gravis lingua reduxit avos.
Mart. 2. 90. 7 - 10

Martial praises Sura for his old-fashioned style of oratory. Besides his being a man of learning and culture and an orator, he may be termed doctus as a natural philosopher, as Pliny consults him in one letter on the explained

---

\(^1\) I.e., the doctissima wife would aspire to wealth, social position and other things typical of the cultured and urban set.

\(^2\) On Votienus see Tac. Ann. 4. 42, where he is described as a man who was noted for his ingenium..

\(^3\) Kontogianni (1996) ad loc. Also mentioned by Martial at 9. 44. 1, and by Statius (Silv. 4. 6), also for ownership of the Hercules statuette.

\(^4\) White (1972) 74 – 9; Aly Hassan (2003) 143 - 44.

\(^5\) Dio Cass. 68. 15. 3ff. for historical information on Sura. Martial also mentions Sura at 6. 64. 13 as being appreciative of his epigrams, and possibly at 1. 49. 40 with no remarkable context.
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

ebb and flow of a spring (Ep. 4. 30), and in another on the existence of ghosts (Ep. 7. 27).

Martial also uses doctus in its general sense of "learned" or "cultured" but with a somewhat stronger connotation of having to do specifically with literature. For example, Martial terms Seneca the Philosopher doctus (4. 40. 2) for his general accomplishments, no doubt including his writing. Then, in relation to the writings of Sallust, Martial says in one of the Apophoreta:

Sallustius

Hic erit, ut perhibent doctorum corda virorum,
Primus Romana Crispus in historia.
Mart. 14. 191

Docti, learned men, men of education and, apparently, literary discernment, judge Sallust first of Roman historians.

Next, Martial uses doctus of men who serve as patrons and critics of his own work and are probably amateur poets also. Not only does doctus acquire the further connotation of "poetically skil[led]" in these examples, but also Martial shows his concern for doctrina in his own poetry. Martial uses doctus of a Secundus, who may be Pliny the Younger, in epigram 5. 80.(1)

Martial also uses doctus of his own work. At 10. 20 (19), addressed to his muse, Thalia, he says:

Nec doctum satis et parum severum,
Sed non rusticulum tamen libellum
Facundo mea Plinio Thalia
I prefer.

Mart. 10. 20 (19). 1 - 4

Let Thalia take Martial's book to facundus, "eloquent", Pliny.(2) Although Martial with modesty terms his book not doctus and severus enough, "learned" and "austere" enough for a Pliny, yet he maintains it has

---

(1) Stephenson (1880) ad loc., but White (1972) 74-78 and Howell (1995) ad loc. argue against.

(2) Pliny quotes a large part of this epigram in a letter which he wrote shortly after Martial's death (Ep. 3. 21), see Aly Hassan (2003) 127-128.
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

some refinement (non rusticulus).(1) Doctus in context implies "sophisticated" or "cultured", and connotes also "in accordance with professional literary standards".

In epigram 6. 61. (60) Martial goes even further in giving doctus definition. In this epigram discusses what is necessary for truly good poetry:

Rem factam Pomppullus habet, Faustine: legetur
Et nomen toto sparget in orbe suum.
"Sic leve flavorum valeat genus Usiporum, Quisquis et Ausonium non amat imperium".
Ingeniosa tamen Pomppulli scripta feruntur.
"Sed famae non est hoc, mihi crede, satis:
Quam multi tineas pascunt blattasque diserti,
Et redimunt soli carmina docta cocci!
Nescio quid plus est, quod donat saecula chartis:
Victurus genium debet habere liber.'
Mart. 6. 61

Martial thinks toe poet Pomppullus' renown is short-lived. Faustinus' rejoinder is that Pomppullus' scripta are said to be ingeniosa, "showing ability", which is then given more definition by its associations with diserti and docta carmina in line 7 and 8. In those two lines Martial says there are many poets who are diserti, "fluent" or "eloquent", whose works worms devour (i.e., go unread), and whose docta carmina, poems that adhere to the established literary code or format, are bought only by cooks. To be diseritus and doctus, however, is not enough for lasting fame. A book must have genium, "poetic inspiration" or "genius", to achieve immortality.

Docta carmina then in this poem connotes poetry that is technically and conventionally correct (according to the standards of the day), certainly in expression, as disertus indicates, and presumably in content, meter and general format. Doctrina alone, however, does not make a poet, says Martial, referring without doubt to his own poetry here, poetry which, he feels, though it falls short of contemporary literary standards for doctrina, is

(1) Stephenson (1880) ad loc., and Post (1967) ad loc., equate "non rusticulum nimis" with having a degree of urbanitas, "wit".

245
inspired. Thus Martial shows his reactionary stance: he denigrates the established literary standard of his day - characterized by its high degree of doctrina - for the more traditional view of a poem as inspired, even divinely so, as the term genius implies.

Martial quite a few times applies doctus to Catullus, his avowed model. Martial uses doctus of Catullus twice in Apophoreta, both times in identifying the origin of an abject: at 14. 100. 1 and 14. 152. 1 he says articles mentioned in the poems are from terra docti Catulli, a stock application of the epithet.

In epigram 1. 61 Martial again includes Catullus in a list of Roman authors, this time for the renown they have brought to their birthplaces. The epigram begins with the line: Verona docti syllabas amat vatis (1. 61. 1), and continues with similar laudatory references to many other writers, including Livy, Vergil and Ovid, and several contemporaries of Martial's, though non with epithets. Doctus qualifying vates is potentially interesting: it implies that doctus connotes "technical proficiency" since vates would account for the element of divine inspiration normally part of the poetic process. Vates, however, has by Martial's time already lost its earlier solemn associations, and is practically synonymous with poeta. Syllabae, however, may suggest Catullus' hendecasyllabics, and then his adaptation of the Greek meter into Latin which is distinctly neoteric.

Finally on Catullus, in epigram 7. 99 Martial, in commending his work to Domitian, would have his intermediary to the emperor say of him:

---

(1) For Catullus as Martial's model see 10. 78. 16, 7. 99. 6-7, 5. 5. 5-6, 1. Praef. 11.

(3) For syllabae suggesting hendecasyllabics see Aly Hassan (2003) ad loc., and Howell (1980) ad loc., who then cites Mart. 10. 9. 1 - 3:

Undenis pedibusque syllabisque
Et multo sale nec tamen protervo
Notus gentibus ille Martialis

Cf. Post (1967) at 1. 61. 1, who comments that probably applied particularly to Catullus for his making hendecasyllabic meter fashionable at Rome.
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

‘Temporibus praestat non nihil iste tuis,
Nec Marso nimium minor est doctoque Catullo’.
Mart. 7. 99. 6 - 7

Martial believes that he, like Marsus and doctus Catullus, brings something to Domitian’s times. The neoteric sense for doctus works particularly well here because it fits the sentiment of the lines in that Catullus brought the Alexandrian style of poetry to his times, many elements of which Martial himself employs. As far as it is possible to tell, then, Martial, applies doctus to Catullus in its sense of neoteric “learned master technician”, both here and in general.

In the next usage of doctus, applied to poetess Sulpicia (of the late first century A.D.), Martial gives to doctus much of sense of ἀορός. This usage of doctus comes in epigram 10. 35, where Martial begins by calling all young wives and husbands who wish to please their spouses to read Sulpicia’s love poetry. He continues:

Non haec Colchidos adserit fuorem
Diri prandia nec refert Thyestae;
Scyllam, Byblida nec fuisse credit:
Sed castos docet et probos amores,
Lusus, delicias facetiasque.
Cuius carmina qui bene aestimarit,
Nullam dixerit esse nequiorem,
Nullam dixerit esse sanctiorem.
Tales Egeriae iocos fuisse
Udo crediderim Numae sub antro.
Hac condiscipula vel hac magistra
Esses doctior et pudica, Sappho.
Mart. 10. 35. 5- 16

(1) Cf. Ferguson (1963) 7, who says that doctus “is more than a stock epithet for a poet; it is peculiarly applied to Catullus, and marks him out as the leading poet among the neoteric school, which adapted Alexandrian poetry to Latin.
Martial begins by lauding Sulpicia for eschewing typical tragic and epic themes, and then goes on in praise of her great ability in presenting the subject of amor. Specifically he says that Sulpicia in her poetry docet "teaches", pure and proper love, but in such a way that no one is *nequior", "more naughty", than she, but also no one is sanctor than she. She is then compared to one of the old Italian camenae, Egeria, who was Numa’s coniux or amica, in her capacity to achieve a medium between the risqué and the proper, and as a Muse, to give it best expression. (1) The use of doctior in the comparison with Sappho then connotes not only "more technically skilled in poetry", as in previous examples, but also "more knowledgeable", in this case, about amor, because she has privileged (divine) information on the subject-matter. Indeed, Martial goes on in the last five lines of the poem (17-21) to praise Sulpicia for her own attractiveness and extreme devotion to her husband. In sum, Martial uses doctus with the extended sense of * SOPHOS* (of poetess Sulpicia), where it connotes "divinely informed poet," as well as technically skilled.

In support of the extended sense Martial gives to doctus in his poem on Sulpicia, again like many other Latin poets, also likewise he uses doctus of the Muses to mean "divinely knowledgeable" as well as "poetically skilled". For example, at 9. 42. 3 he invokes the doctae sorores and Apollo’s priestess to serve his Patron Stella in writing poetry. And at 10. 58. 5-6 he speaks of the allegiance Faustinus, another Patron of his who wrote poetry, and he himself had for the doctae Pierides. He ends this poem by swearing "per veneranda mihi Musarum sacra", on the rites of the Muses that he venerates. Thus he shows the extended sense of “divinely knowledgeable” as well as “poetically skilled” for doctus used of the Muses.

Statius uses doctus a number of times in a literary-critical context with several different connotations. The first usage considered is when doctae is used of the aves who are called to mourn the death of Melior’s parrot. Statius says to these birds: “Huc doctae stipentur aves, quis nobile fandi / ius natura dedit" (Silv. 2. 4. 16-17). The birds are humorously termed doctae in their capacity to speak.

---

(1) On Egeria see Livy 1. 19. 5, and Ovid. Fast. 3. 257.
In the next several usages of doctus Statius by context gives the term the sense of “learned”, “cultured” and “poetically appreciative”, if not skilled. For example, in Silvae 2. 7, a poem celebrating Lucan’s birthday, Statius says of the infant Lucan that he will not move rivers or wild herds like Orpheus:

sed septicm iuga Mariumque Thybrim et doctos equites et eloquente cantu purpureum trahes senatum.
Stat. Silv. 2. 7. 45-47.

Lucan will attract as an audience with his eloquent poetry the equites who are docti, educated and cultured enough to appreciate poetry. Then, in Silvae 5. 3, a lament for his father, Statius, after just having praised his father's skill in poetry, makes this comparison using his father's birthplace, Parthenope:

quo non Monychiae quicquam praestantius arces doctaque Cyrene Sparteve animosa creavit.
Stat. Silv. 5. 3. 107-108.

Neither Athens, docta Cyrene nor Sparta has produced anything more excellent. Of course Cyrene is noted for Callimachus,(1) as Athens and Sparta are for their poets.(2) Hence, doctus here can mean not only “learned” or “cultured”, but almost “poetical”. Later in the same poem Statius says of his father:

tu pandere doctus
carmina Battiiadae latebrasque Lycophronis atri
Sophronaque implicitum tenuisque arcana Corinnae.
Stat. Silv. 5. 3. 156-58.

(1) Gibson (2006) at Silv. 5. 3. 107-108 comments: “doctae Cyrene can evoke Callimachus, not only because it was his patria, but also because doctrina was one of his qualities..

(2) Athens’ poets are well known, Sparta produced Alcman and Tyrtaeus (see Vollmer [1971] ad loc., for the allusions).
Statius’ father is pandere doctus, “learned (enough) to explain”, the verse of Callimachus and other earlier Greek poets. Finally, in Silvae 1. 3, on the villa of Manilius Vopiscus,\(^1\) Statius ends with this wish for the owner:

\[
\text{sic docta frequentes}
\]
\[
\text{otia, sic omni detectus pectora nube}
\]
\[
\text{finem Nestoreae precor egrediare senectae.}
\]

Manilius is to have docta otia, literally, learned leisure”. As, however, it has already been established in the poem that Manilius is an amateur poet and composes while at his villa (lines 99-104), docta otia takes on the connotation of leisure devoted to the writing and singing of his poetry.

In the remaining usages of doctus in Statius there is a directly perceivable connotation of “poetically skilled” for the word. Instances are numerous. Statius says in praise of Lucan that “docti furor arduus Lucreti” yields to Lucan's Muse (Silv. 2. 7. 76). Apollo is termed doctus (Silv. 5. 3. 91) in his capacity as patron of poets. Lucan’s wife, Polla, is called a docta suitable to Lucan’s ingenium (Silv. 2. 7. 83). A slave boy who was an accomplished poet is termed doctissimus (Silv. 2 preaf. 21), and Statius' patron Pollius, an amateur poet, is called a doctus alumnus of puteoli (Silv. 2. 2. 97). In all these examples doctus not only means “learned” but also connotes at least “possessing poetic taste” or “skill”.

Furthermore, Statius uses doctus several times in a way which brings out the extended sense of “divinely informed or inspired”, as discussed above with the elegists. For example, Statius twice uses doctus of annes, “streams” from which poets draw their inspiration (Silv. 1. 2. 259 and 2. 7. 12). He also uses doctus of his own penates (Silv. 1. 2. 50), metonymy for Statius’ own home (and ultimately, himself), which are said to be receptive to the teachings of the Muse Erato on the subject-matter at hand. Likewise Statius uses doctus of Pollius’ chelys, “lyre” (Silv. 2. 2. 119), meaning his lyric poetry, with which he is able to charm the Sirens, Tritonia and even dolphins. Finally, Statius uses doctus of oestrus, “passion” or "frenzy" by which poets' hearts are fired who drink from the fountain of Hippocrene

The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

(Silv. 2. 7. 3). The context in all these examples suggests strongly that for Statius doctus had the extended sense of “divinely informed or inspired” as well as simply connoting “skilled at poetry”.

Quintilian's use of doctus in a literary-critical context bears mention. At 10. 1 in his discussion of Homer Quintilian says:

Adfectus quidem uel illos mites uel hos concitatos nemo erit tam indoctus qui non in sua potestate hunc auctorem habuisse fateatur.

Quint. 10. 1 48.

Indoctus has the connotation of “uneducated” or “lacking culture”, and probably with respect to poetry. Next, Quintilian Domitian says of Domitian’s poetry:

Quid tamen his ipsis eius operibus in quae donato imperio iuuenis secesserat sublimius, doctius, omnibus denique numeris praestantius?

Quint. 10. 1 91.

Doctius means here “more skillfully and properly written”, both in regard to meter and content.

Then, finally, at 10. 1. 97 Quintilian says in regard to Accius and Pacuvius: Pacuvium videri doctiorem qui esse docti affectant volunt”. Those who affect learning think Pacuvius to be doctiorem. The implied criticism in the phrasing of “qui esse docti affectant” shows that Quintilian himself withholds judgment on the matter. However, as with Horace's terming of Pacuvius as doctus that was discussed above (at Hor. Ep. 2. 1. 55-56), Quintilian appears to use the term doctus in the sense of “learned”, and by extension, “technically proficient at poetry”. And again, as with Horace, docti here seems to designate those who comprise the contemporary literary coterie.
Conclusion

Doctus in its most general sense for the Latin poets meant “educated” or “cultured”, and more specifically “trained in formal literature”, and hence “able to appreciate or write poetry”. More specifically, doctus was used as the equivalent of the Greek term σοφός as applied to early Greek poets in its sense of having privileged knowledge of a theme - “being divinely informed”, and having poetic skill in presenting that theme. Closely related to this sense was doctus used of the Muses or other divinities associated with poetry where it meant “knowledgeable” as well as “skilled in poetry”. Also, doctus is used of one who embraced and practiced technical literary ideals - namely, those of Alexandrian, in the main, where was a high regard for form, language and meter, an erudite manner and style. Doctus in the latter sense often connoted one who was a member of the contemporary literary coterie.
Bibliography

- Allen, Katherine (1915) "Doctus Catullus", CPh 10, 222-223.

- Aly Hassan Abdel-Gayed (2003) Σχόλια στο 10ο Βιβλίο Επιγραμμάτων του Μορτιώλη (Επιγρ. 1-53), Διδακτορική Διατριβή, Θεσσαλονίκη. Α.Π.Θ.

- Ferguson, John (1963) "Catullus and Martial", PACA 6, 3-15.
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry

- Pascal, Carlo (1920) Scritti vari di letteratura latina, Torino.

254
The Concept of DOCTUS in Latin Poetry